Dear Mrs. Thompson: I am a stenographer, and have worked for three years without ever a day off. The people I work for have said nothing about it, but I feel I cannot stand it to go through the summer without a rest. What should I do?

By all means assert your rights. It your employers are human, they will give you a vacation if you ask for it, and think the more of you for asking. You can do better work after taking rest, and they will profit by it. Frame your request courteously and I have no doubt but that it will be granted,

Dear Mrs. Thompson: I have had a quarrel with a young man, and we parted in anger. He said a certain wrong. Do you think it would be proper to tell the young man? He has not been near since the trouble.

MISS R. M. G. Ordinarily, I should say that the first step should be taken by young man, inasmuch as most disagreements are over matters that in themselves do not count for much. It you feel, however, that you were in the wrong, you might write a note, acknowledging your error. It would then be the young man's place to take steps to restore the old friendly footing.

Dear Mrs. Thompson: If I should wring the necks of some of the neighbors' chickens that destroy my garden, could I be prosecuted?
